CAR CARE AWARE

IS IT NECESSARY TO WARM UP YOUR CAR?

When your car's engine is cold, the computer tells the fuel injectors to stay open longer, allowing more fuel into the engine to help it run cold. If your car was built in the last twenty years, you almost certainly have electronic fuel injection. So, as long as it starts normally, you can confidently put it in gear and go, without warming it up, even in winter.

If you own an older vehicle, with an old-fashioned carburetor instead of a fuel-injection engine, you may need to give it a minute or two of idling, to let the oil thin out, but no more than that.

If it's below zero outside, it would be a good idea to give the engine five minutes, or a little less. If it's around ten or twenty degrees, just a minute or two is plenty of time to let the oil circulate, and then you can safely hit the road.

But remember, no matter how cold it is, warming up your car in the garage is a bad idea. Idling a car in a garage, even with the door open, is dangerous and exposes the driver to carbon monoxide and other noxious gases. If the garage is attached, those fumes can also enter the house. If you feel it's necessary to spend a few minutes warming up the car, pull safely out of the garage first.

The first few minutes of your drive are your warm-up time, so be gentle. Drive moderately until the engine is approaching operating temperature. Modern engines warm up more quickly when they're driven. And the sooner they warm up, the sooner they reach maximum efficiency and deliver the best fuel economy and performance.
