Woodland Express Garden Railroad Exhibit on Display at the Holden Arboretum

Visitors can step into a magical garden railroad featuring G-scale trains traveling through tunnels, bridges, and animal habitats handcrafted with natural materials, at Woodland Express, on display at the Holden Arboretum through September 15.

This world in miniature features “botanical architecture” made from leaves, twigs, and other natural materials by Applied Imagination, a Kentucky-based firm that has been producing award-winning public garden exhibits for decades. Among the featured elements of Woodland Express are replicas of three Ashtabula County covered bridges – Harpersfield, Riverdale, and Doyle.

“Woodland Express offers something for everyone,” said Jillian Slane, Director of Exhibits and Experiences for Holden Forests & Gardens. “Train enthusiasts will love the imaginative track layout. Garden lovers will marvel at the unique plantings and use of natural materials. And kids will learn about the animals that inhabit woodlands.”

Giving Kids Their Freedom

How many have you cringed as you put your newborn to sleep? Skipped a breath as you dropped your infant off at daycare, toddler at preschool, middle schooler at a friend's, teen at the mall or college? Probably every time. Just like me. Our children are in constant need of protection...but need an equal amount of freedom. Especially as they enter the teen years. I don't know about you, but my oldest didn't want anything to do with me as soon as she figured out she could toddle around on her own, which by the way was prior to turning one! That was a stunner. No more rocking her in the chair (as if) and no more 'holding onto her'. Period.

Even more of a shock than her wanting to separate from me so quickly, was the day her dad and I dropped her off 'all- alone' at preschool! That was a day

I'll never forget. I cried, a lot. We home-schooled soon after that. Not because I'm a helicopter mom, whatever that is, (really, I'm not). I just care. If you are yet a parent of growing children, or have been one, balancing love and concern for your child, while letting go, is tough! I've been working on it for the past twenty-one years. I'm not sure that I've got it down pat yet, but I keep trying. Some days I don't reach out enough it seems, and others, well, they think it's enough.

I check cell phones (yes, I do), I attempt to creep on their social media accounts (which you can forget about thanks to Snapchat and the like). I call parents of friends who my kids want to hang out with (yes, to make sure there is an adult home) and I make guys or girls, who want to date my child, meet me at my door, and if they're lucky, sit down at my dinner table for a meal.

Is that hovering? I don't know, I don't think so. Hovering possibly looks something like driving your kid to school and back even when they can take the bus. Overbearing might look like the parent who doesn't allow a child to play a sport (ever) for fear they'll get hurt. Controlling might be a mom who puts her daughter on a diet, or a dad who forces his son to submit a college application only to his alma mater. I don't hover, helicopter, or control. I care. I guide. I support. I love. And I do still try to let go.

Once children become aware of their own self and their needs, as early as infancy, they'll want to go their own way. It's natural. There's no real stopping them. If you don't believe me, just look. Little babes try to get down when they know they can push their way out of your arms, to crawl somewhere. Toddlers throw tantrums to get what they want. Kids tell lies and pit parent against parent. They know what they want, and often how to get it; independence starts young.

For anyone who has a middle child, like I do, I'm pretty sure you feel that some children have a need for freedom so strong, that it starts in the womb! My M.C. came out screaming...all the way home and for the next 9 1/2 weeks. She always wanted answers to everything and wanted things her way. She wanted a job, a car, a career, a family, her own house, pets and well, anything else she could think of. So, here we are, seventeeeeee whole years later, and well, she's got quite a bit accomplished already and blazing the trail to get to the rest.

Happy Independence Day, Peanut. You've been venturing out on your own. You've made your own road...a trail all your own...stating who you are and where you're going. You've graduated high school, made your own money, bought your own vehicle, raised your own pup, and set off on your own adventure...in the Army. Who could stop you? As your mom, my thought was 'why would I want to'?

This July 4th, my youngest daughter, and middle child, (should've seen it coming) will be just about halfway through basic training, then she'll continue on to medical training in another state, and then on to the rest of her life...somewhere else probably far from here. All way sooner than many kids her age. I know her life will change. It will be hard. It will be crazy. It will be scary, and adventurous, but wow, it'll be amazingly rewarding! No matter how many question my support...I can't, I wouldn't...change the trajectory of her life. Why would I? This could only be good for her. She knows what's ahead, even if she doesn't know, she is ready, even if she's not. But she wants it. Even if I know, or think I know...I don't. But I won't stop her. I'll just be here for her.

I've never appreciated when kid's have dreams and an adult comes sweeping in and puts the kibosh on it. It's not fair. I mean we all have inner passions, desires and wishes. So be it if they are childhood dreams. If I don't put the wind in her sails, maybe no one will. If I don't push her over the line into the direction she says she wants to go, then I'm the one she won't come back to.

The moral of the story is, we as parents shall not stand in the way of our children's visions. Their dreams, their courage, and their why, should all weigh greater on us than our own fears, concerns or knowledge. I don't know what lies ahead for my daughter, even though I think I do. Still, who am I to tell her she shouldn't, or couldn't? I believe she can.

No matter how many people ask me, "Aren't you scared?"; I shake my head and respond, "No, I'm not afraid...I'm excited...because she's excited". That's unconditional love. Yes, of course I will

by Carole Richards

While I have written often about the importance of good reading skills, writing skills are equally important. Once a lawyer told me new lawyers may lack strong writing skills.

Here are the five components of good writing.

- 1. Sentence Construction. Can the student construct a good sentence with a subject and predicate with proper punctuation. Does the student understand what makes a proper sentence? Does the student know how to write a complex sentence with prepositional phrases, adverbs, adjectives, etc.? Often students confuse the subject of a sentence with a noun and the predicate in a sentence with the verb.
- 2. Paragraph Construction. Once a student can form good sentences, they need to understand paragraph writing: topic sentence, three supporting sentences and a concluding sentence in a paragraph. This sounds simple, but many students cannot do it.

- 3. Spelling. Students may struggle writing because they cannot spell the words they want to use. This gets back to poor reading again because good spelling skills are linked to strong reading skills. If you cannot spell, your energy goes into spelling the words, not expressing your thoughts. Spell checker helps and should be used but the writer needs to get "close enough" for the spell checker to interpret the words.

- 4. Essay Construction. Does the student understand that the essay includes an introductory paragraph, three supporting paragraphs and concluding paragraphs? Essays can have more or less supporting paragraphs but this is a standard. Before a student can write a research paper, they need to be able to construct a good essay. You must walk before you can run.

- 5. Editing. Has the student reread their sentence, paragraph or essay? Have they made certain that they are communicating what they really mean to the reader? A good writer edits their writing more than once. In addition, a student may benefit from an editing checklist including:

Sentence Structure

Does my writing have proper sentence structure? Are all my sentences complete with a subject and a predicate? Are any sentences too long, or do I have "run-on sentences?"

Mechanics

Did I use correct punctuation? Have I capitalized all sentences and proper names? Do I know where to place commas? Are all my words spelled correctly?

Usage

Do my subjects and predicates agree? Do my nouns and pronouns match? Writing is a skill that will stay with you throughout your life! Stay with it.

Finally, practice, practice, practice! The more you write, the better you become. And, to emphasize, make sure editing is an important part of your writing practice. Happy writing. Your student can be a good writer.

worry. That is something I'm pretty sure all Mama's do on day one of giving birth, and never stop. Of course, I'll worry about my child! Who wouldn't? But I will not helicopter. I will not prevent her, talk her out of, convince her that what she wants is wrong. Not today, and especially not with this.

Now ask me if there is a guy on this planet good enough for her... and I'll tell you a different story.

Happy July 4th everyone. Please take a moment to salute and respect those that served you and I, and this country, past present and future. Thank you for reading and have a safe Independence Day. Now go out there and support a child's dreams! For more common sense parenting tips and touching stories, please visit our blog at www.familymatterswithamber.blogspot.com.
