Researchers suggest higher levels of vitamin D are associated with decreasing risk of breast cancer. Their epidemiological study is published in PLOS ONE. Participants with high blood levels of Vitamin D had one-fifth the risk of breast cancer compared to those with the lowest levels. To reach the higher levels of Vitamin would generally require dietary supplements of 4,000 to 6,000 international units (IU) per day, less with the addition of moderate daily sun exposure wearing very minimal clothing (approximately 10-15 minutes per day outdoors at noon).

Reviewing medical information gathered on more than 6,000 adults over a 10-year period, Johns Hopkins researchers have found that lower-than-normal blood levels of vitamin D were linked to increased risk of early signs of interstitial lung disease (ILD). Results of the most recent data analysis, published in the Journal of Nutrition, suggest that low vitamin D might be one factor involved in developing interstitial lung disease.

Children who are vitamin D deficient have a greater risk of having more severe forearm fractures requiring surgical treatment, according to a new study presented at the Annual Meeting of the American Academy of Orthopaedic Surgeons (AAOS). Fractures in children are very common, with some estimates as high as 50 percent of boys and 40 percent of girls having at least one fracture by age 18. Of these fractures, the forearm is the most common site, accounting for approximately 25 percent of all pediatric fractures in the U.S. Vitamin D deficiency can lead to negative calcium balance, low bone mineral density and quality leading to compromised bone strength, so it makes sense for patients to be more susceptible to fractures at lower impact load and more susceptible to greater severity when fractures do occur.
