The Fine Arts Association's New Leadership Team Acting Upon Upward Change!

After a time of historical turnover at FAA, CEO, Paul Holm, with a background in music education, administration and leadership came on board in January. Since then, he has been spending time hiring "the right people and putting them in the right places". Judith Peters, with over ten years of involvement with customer service is now moving to an Administrative Coordinator role. On the same team going in her fifth year at FAA is Suzanne Benet, Manager of Finance and HR.

The education team who will carry the organization to new levels in Northeast Ohio begins with the Director of Education, Michael Lund Ziegler. Coming from the Cincinnati area, Michael was brought on in September to bring fresh experience to the organization from starting his own nonprofit, Music for the Sake of Music in Greenbay, Wisconsin. Jackie DiFrangia, Education Coordinator, also came on board in September and will use her leadership and relationship building experience to ensure faculty communication and field trips. Melissa Sextella, visual art faculty member for over five years joined as a Curriculum Coordinator to lead FAA's outreach and programming. To complete the education team, Ann Marie Raddell, with over ten years as a music therapy faculty member has the additional role as the Coordinator of Creative Arts Therapies.

The Customer Experience team at FAA has taken a new energetic lead by Customer Experience Coordinator, Maggie Gatzke, who has a history of theatrical experience in the area. Long term Customer Service Representatives in the department, Shirley Cline and Dee Germano, are helping build the team and improve upon serving the growing attendance.

Manager of Marketing and Communications, Alyssa Lombardi, has been leading the Marketing and Communications team since June. She has since taken on a new website, media presence, and other areas of reach in which her and key leader, Marcia Kish, Special Projects Coordinator, are excited about.

Over five years working at FAA, Yvonne Delgado Thomas, Director of Development, leads the Development team with Ryan Kearns, Development Manager to increased goals and growing partnerships. Ryan joined the team in August with his experience in fundraising, grantsmanship, and violin performance.

The FAA Performance team consists of David Malinowski, The Roger and Anne Clapp Chair of Performing Arts, who has grown up around FAA. Ann Hedger, Programming Coordinator with over 25 years of experience at FAA. Behind the magic that happens around the FAA performances: Michael Roesch, Technical Director, Hannah Sandham, Costume Shop Manager, and Thomas (Tom) Linsenmeier, Resident Sound Designer.

The maintenance team currently consists of long-term staff, John Meyer and Fred Burkhart. FAA is currently searching for an additional maintenance team member who will take the lead on evening events and performances.

The Fine Arts Association staff, faculty, and board of directors are spreading the positivity about the upward change that the organization has quickly grown their culture around. The positive responses received are signs for what is to come from the community arts organization that serves "all of the arts under one roof".

Family Matters with Amber

Military Family Appreciation Month

One night, at just about midnight, during the most gruesome part of the movie “Hacksaw Ridge”, my petite-barely-fifteen-year-old-little-girly-girl turned to me in the dark and whispered, “Now is probably... agoodtimetotellyou...uhhhh...I want to join the Army”.

I’ve always told my kids they can tell me anything, and while they can and I’m usually good with it, I’ll have to admit, I was a wide-eyed emoji right about then. It wasn’t surreal, nor was it a total shock, but it wasn’t expected and definitely not great timing in my opinion. There was a bunch of bloodshed on the screen! Today, she’ll still swear it was perfect timing for her, and to me that’s what matters.

I can’t stand the sight of blood. I’m a basket case even when it comes to a little blood. One time, while my family and I were at a Chick-Fil-A, my son, who was probably only five years old at the time, was bouncing up and down with his hands clinging to the counter. Yep, you guessed it! He banged his face on the counter. I saw blood, freaked, then began yelling at the poor teenager behind the register, “Someone help him! DO something!”.

I guess it would’ve been okay to just ask for a little ice, or even a napkin, but my brain doesn’t quite work like that during those moments. He brought up that day when we were there recently. I couldn’t believe he remembered that night; it was ten years ago! I also couldn’t believe I’d acted that way!

We’re all built for something, and clearly, I’m not built for medical emergencies or triage because of my aversion to blood. But I know someone who is. She’s able to stand by during any type of medical procedure, even dress and redress a wound with no supervision (we’re talking huge gashes) and she can attend to anyone with any injury with the utmost calmness. People call her my Mini-Me, however we only look and act similar, we don’t share this gift whatsoever.

Our family has been lucky we’ve not had too many injuries. Thank God. But, if we do, it’s been her that I call on. Last Halloween we had a party and allowed the boys to play in the back yard in the dark, and my son rammed into the wood splitter. Tucked way back in the corner, everyone else knew where it was and steered clear, except him. I remember my daughter and her friend had just come in the door as I got him settled with ice (and a HUGE knot on his shin, and yes a little blood). She was the one to talk to him as if nothing big happened. She was the one who just calmly assessed the wound and took in all who were in the room. Me? I was a motormouth, buzzing around the room grabbing my head, wondering if he’d broken something and needed to go to the hospital! I’m in the right profession, that is certain. And so is she.

I’m so happy my child is using her gifts. I’m honored that she’s courageous enough to go where some wouldn’t dare, to help save people so they may live longer and their families can see them again. I feel privileged to know that my daughter would risk her own life for mine, yours

My father who served in the Navy and even a complete stranger’s. It’s not easy for her to do that. While she is okay with the sight of blood, she is making major sacrifices. She hasn’t seen her family in over four months, just mom for 48 hours at graduation/family day. She has only been to one party and to the beach once this past summer, while all her friends got to hang out before heading to college. She went to basic training where she knew no one. The sacrifices will continue. While we know that’s her choice, I’m still humbled.

November is Military Family Appreciation Month. Of course, I’d have to write something for this. Especially because I’m learning just how much a sacrifice it is for the ones left behind. I have met spouses and many other families who know and love someone serving in the military and I find that it’s a struggle not just for the one who left, but those at home. The family goals are the same, but the sacrifices are different. Some will face births, celebrate benchmarks, birthdays and anniversaries while apart from their loved one.

We, as Americans, are afforded so much of what we want. Have you ever imagined if that wasn’t an option? What IF, you couldn’t have a single thing you ‘wanted’? Only shelter, food, clean water. What if you had nothing else? How do you think you would feel? Did I mention that there’s no cell phone or computer? Imagine being completely cut off from the outside world. Marching stiffly before dawn into the dark in all conditions, with only perfection on your mind. Your body burns, aches, fatigues, and occasionally breaks. Sleep is the time you might just actually feel your best. But maybe not. That's just some of bootcamp. I hadn't yet mentioned the gas chamber, big spiders, and the 40 ft. wall (yes, you'll have to jump whether you're ready or not). Add someone screaming at you, lack of sleep and a ridiculous amount of consequences for simple errors like a wrinkled uniform or a poorly made bed... combined with very little reward, because that doesn't come for a while and you aren't sure when...if ever. It does end, but it's all preparation for a bigger job.

Becoming a military parent, and also working on a writing project with a Vietnam Vet recently, caused me to learn that some people have such strong beliefs that they mistreat soldiers. It never occurred to me that this happened! There are many national holidays in place and they're clearly to honor our armed forces, because we know that without them none of us would be here. This should speak volumes. Even if someone is not a supporter of certain leadership or beliefs, even if they'd never prefer to see a war exist, at the very least they should be appreciative for the men and women (and their families) who are selfless enough to serve them, the ones they love, and their country. While one might not condone wars or violence, they can respect, love and appreciate the people willing to go, as well as those who support them in the trenches back home. It takes a village they say to raise a child. Well, it takes a family to support a soldier.

Tolerance and acceptance. Live and let live. These are a few things I find lacking in the world. Not because I'm suddenly a military mom, but because it's true. It's everywhere. Or actually, nowhere at all. Love. We have to love. Regardless of our own beliefs about what our government (or anyone else) should do, all people need love and support. Soldiers should always be honored for their selflessness. We are in a generation where it's not too common for enlistment. Matter of fact, just 1 % of our younger generations become part of our military. ONE. PERCENT.

I ask you this month, even if you vehemently despise war and fighting, or disagree with our government and the powers and efforts of our military, when you see a person in uniform or donning a veteran cap, shirt or bumper sticker, stop and think about what freedoms you have. Honor them and your ancestors who served. Today, please take a moment of silence to honor those who lost their lives in every war we've ever fought. Our current life in this country was and is only made possible by those who serve and those who are behind them.

Kevin P. Clinton Wildlife Center Welcomes Two New Bobcats for Rehabilitation

Meet the two new bobcat kittens being rehabilitated at the Kevin P. Clinton Wildlife Center at Penitentiary Glen Reservation. They were transferred to the center from another wildlife center in Belmont County. Someone found them lying next to the road with no mother in sight. They were underweight for their age and positive for parasites, but overall very healthy. The male and female siblings are doing extremely well, doubling their weight and already becoming fierce little predators. We expect to release them in the spring in a suitable natural habitat near where they were found.

The Ohio Division of Wildlife contacted the Kevin P. Clinton Wildlife Center at Penitentiary Glen Reservation to care for the kittens because of the experience, knowledge and success the staff has in bobcat rehabilitation. Lake Metroparks has released four bobcats under its care in the past six years. The wildlife center is currently the only rehabilitator in the state with this experience and success.

The bobcats will not be on public display to prevent human imprinting. Bobcats are a predator in Ohio, so we must always have safety as one of our main priorities when dealing with an animal that is at the top of its food chain. Staff takes every safety precaution when handling bobcats for our safety and for the safety of the animals. This includes making sure the bobcats do not become habituated or imprinted on people. If bobcats expect humans to feed them or they are not afraid of humans, the end result is detrimental to the bobcats.

The bobcats eventually will be moved to an intermediate outdoor enclosure. They will quickly adapt to being outside and have plenty of room to climb and run. The kittens will be kept in the intermediate enclosure until all of their vaccinations are up to date and we observe enough natural behaviors that we feel comfortable moving them to their final, larger enclosure to prepare them for release in the spring of 2020.

In order to encourage natural behaviors, the staff has arranged the larger enclosure to mimic their natural habitat. The bobcats will be able to hunt, jump and climb while getting used to the sights, smells and sounds of the outdoors. We will be able to observe their behavior with cameras placed inside the enclosure and we will record data on their development and new wild behaviors we observe. Once the bobcats have been moved to this enclosure you will be able to see the bobcats in action at goto.lakemetroparks.com/bobcat-cam.

For more information about bobcats, you can also visit the Ohio Division of Wildlife's website: <http://wildlife.ohiodnr.gov/species-and-habitats/species-guide-index/mammals/bobcat>.
