Tumbleweed Smith

THE INFLUENCE OF PAUL BAKER

Tumbleweed Smith

Late in my sophomore year at Baylor I signed up for a history class with a popular professor. I wasn't really enthused about that and one night during a dorm bull session, a student mentioned he had taken a course from Paul Baker in the theater department and it opened his mind. I was the type student that went to college to have fun and did plenty of that during my freshmen year. By the time we had that spring-time confab in the dorm and I heard about Paul Baker, I was beginning to think about learning something worthwhile. I was a business major and the courses didn't interest me. So I dropped the history course and signed up for Drama 106, The Integration of Abilities. It changed my life.

I began to think, to look at the world with new eyes. Paul Baker was a genius at his peak. His productions attracted people from Broadway and Hollywood. Architect Frank Lloyd Wright frequently came by to visit with Mr. Baker about the Dallas Theater Center that Baker was building. Dave Garroway, the first host of the Today Show, had a Sunday afternoon program called Wide Wide World. In the one-hour show that featured Texas, the Baylor Theater was on it for 11 minutes, longer than any other segment of the broadcast. I played a gate of hell and the right front fender of a Cadillac.

I went to the Army after graduation and was stationed in Europe when the World Fair was in progress at Brussels. As I was approaching the American pavilion, I saw a theater student from Baylor and asked him what he was doing there. He said he was picking up the World's Fair Cinematography Award for the film that was made of our production of Hamlet (I played one-third of Horatio).

When you are exposed to that level of talent and accomplishment as a teenager, it has a tendency to stay with you and you want to do something meaningful. Charles Laughton, who came to Baylor to direct Hamlet, called Baker irritating, arrogant, nuts and a genius. The Saturday Review, Life Magazine and similar publications did cover articles on the theater. The play, A Different Drummer, written by the Baylor Theater's playwriting instructor Gene McKinney, was on CBS TV's Omnibus series, presented live from its New York Studio. Baylor's production of Faulkner's As I Lay Dying brought an invitation to present it at the Theater of Nations in Paris, the only non-Broadway production that had ever played there.

Architect Arthur Rogers says no other person contributed more to theater architecture than Paul Baker. "His architectural visions at Baylor, The Dallas Theater Center and the theater at Trinity University have inspired similar constructions in Manila and Seoul." In his book, Integration of Abilities, Baker tells how a summer in Paris gave him a new way of looking at theater. He began to incorporate impressionistic set design in his productions. His teaching methods were the focus of the Booker T. Washington School of the Arts in Dallas. Although he had offers from universities around the world, he chose to remain in Texas where he was born and raised. He died in 2009.
