A new study published in IAMA Internal Medicine links a significantly increased risk for developing dementia, including Alzheimer's disease, to taking commonly used medications with anticholinergic effects at higher doses or for a longer time. Many older people take these medications, which include nonprescription diphenhydramine (Benadryl) and tricyclic antidepressants like doxepin (Sinequan), first-generation antihistamines like chlorpheniramine (Chlor-Trimeton), and antimuscarinics for bladder control like oxybutynin (Ditropan). The study estimated that people taking at least 10 mg/day of doxepin, 4 mg/day of chlorpheniramine, or 5 mg/day of oxybutynin for more than three years' would be at greater risk for developing dementia. Substitutes are available for the first two: a selective serotonin re-uptake inhibitor (SSRI) like citalopram (Celexa) or fluoxetine (Prozac) for depression and a second-generation antihistamine like loratadine (Claritin) for allergies. It's harder to find alternative medications for urinary incontinence, but some behavioral changes can reduce this problem.

Digoxin, a drug commonly used to treat heart conditions, was associated with a 71 percent higher risk of death and a 63 percent higher risk of hospitalization among adults with diagnosed atrial fibrillation and no evidence of heart failure, according to a study that appears in the current online issue of Circulation: Arrhythmia and Electrophysiology. Digoxin is a drug derived from digitalis, which has been used for more than a century for heart rate control in patients with atrial fibrillation, and it remains commonly used for this purpose worldwide. Current clinical practice guidelines for the management of atrial fibrillation recommend the use of digoxin alone for resting heart-rate control in sedentary individuals.

A Christian (Acts 11:26) is a believer (disciple) that follows Christ (Messiah)! History reveals pagan festivals were brought into a church and forced upon people as Christian festivals and ones who opposed were killed (the great apostasy). The Reformation acts that established Protestantism in the 16 century, but the festivals were kept, thought to be given by The Almighty Holy Father. Almost 1700 years later and many so called Christian preachers (protestants) still teach it as the Christian way, but Christ did not change one jot or tittle of The Holy Law (Mt 5:18)! The Holy Bible gives a tree is known by its fruit (Mt 7:14-20)!
