"Improving lives by correcting spines since 1977"

To answer a question often asked here, yes I will use manipulation but priority one to me is the muscle tissue. Since life has its accidents, falls, bumps and bruises, everyone adapts and compensates, so all have their own particular pattern of trigger point trauma. Eventually they may cause lost muscle mobility, balance and strength. In an attempt to reverse this effect I apply light pressure to the trigger point pattern until the muscle releases. With every session, the muscle starts to pull toward balance. As the muscle balance returns, the patterns fade and most clients report very satisfactory results. This approach has always made the most sense to me because the skeleton could not make a move without the soft tissue. How well it moves is what most of my forty-five years of work has been about. As for manipulation, starting with mild stretching of muscle rather than harsh spinal manipulation is much less traumatic and much more effective because it is more gentle and relaxed. Also, as the muscle tissue balances, the swelling reduces and the bones slide more easily back to juxtaposition, reducing nerve pressure, reducing pain and improving function.
