This heartrending historic tale is true Texan and part of a "trilogy" of battles in our war for independence from Mexican rule. The Goliad Massacre occurred only three weeks after the Battle of the Alamo. It was a murderous incident which brought intense national attention and outrage. As the ashes of the Alamo continued to smolder, General Sam Houston feared more catastrophe for his Texas army. Santa Anna, the self-proclaimed "Napoleon of the West" continued to sweep across the middle of Texas, and he was aiming next for a presidio in Goliad that had been rebel-held for about six months. On March 14, 1836, Houston ordered Fannin to evacuate his 400-man force from Goliad and retreat to Victoria, 30 miles to the east on the Guadalupe River.

Re-enactment of battle at Coleta Creek.

La Bahia Mission at Goliad, Texas

Fannin lacked urgency (again) and the finely-bred West-Point-trained officer lingered at Goliad until March 19. He abandoned the site but even in retreat, he moved slowly, allowing horses to graze and stopping for wagon maintenance. He even failed to pack food for the men. When Mexican forces were encountered along the way to Victoria, he decided against taking cover in the woods and ordered his men to make a square formation on the open prairie with cannons at each corner. They held off their attackers successfully until dark, then they dug trenches and buttressed for protection with overturned carts, carcasses of horses and even those of fallen comrades. The men were wounded, exhausted, hungry and thirsty. Toward morning, it became evident that the arrival of more Mexican forces had made their situation hopeless, so they raised the white flag at dawn. The small army was marched back to the Goliad presidio where other rebel captives were being held. Santa Anna's original orders held...those captured would not be treated as prisoners of war with clemency, but would be treated as pirates and shot. They were held for about a week, then on Palm Sunday, March 27, 1836, the prisoners were divided up with the sick and wounded remaining in the chapel, and the rest divided into three groups and marched out onto separate roadways for about a half-mile. When ordered to halt, Mexican officers opened fire and slaughtered every man. The sick in the chapel were executed against the wall or in their makeshift beds. Fannin was executed last, his body burned and his pocketwatch taken as a war prize. The 350 rebels massacred at Goliad almost doubled that of the Alamo dead. A few survived, thanks to a woman known as "the Angel of Goliad" who convinced a colonel to spare the lives of about 20 who were doctors, orderlies and interpreters. Now viewing Santa Anna as a cruel despot, the nation was even more up in arms over the plight of the Texans. Sam Houston began to prepare his men for a decisive battle, one that would take place less than a month later. As he concluded his rallying speech with "Remember the Alamo, the Alamo, the Alamo!", his men thundered back "Remember Goliad!" Waterloo was waiting at San Jacinto.

BRIAN FOUND A HOME IN SONORA

Tumbleweed Smith

Tumbleweed Smith

Brian Rhodes takes care of the golf course in Sonora. He maintains the grass, watering system, the tractors, mowers and other machinery. He does a good job because the course is ranked as the 18th best course in the state. He does not play golf.

"I left the bay area of California 33 years ago," he says. "Just left everything and went for a walk. I went from coast to coast twice, back and forth. I ended up at this intersection and couldn't go anymore. So I stayed here. Got a job within two hours."

He got his job at the golf course after he saw two men trying to fix a golf cart. He told them he could fix it and did. He understands mechanical things. The golf course hired him to maintain it and he moved into some modest quarters on the premises

"There was nothing here, just a shed. I camped out in there the first four months or so, then built a house next to it. I like building things. I like wood-working. I build rocking horses, furniture, all kinds of things."

A lawnmower used on fairways had been in a repair shop in San Antonio for more than a year. Brian arranged to get it back in Sonora and he got it running. Some time ago Brian worked for eight years repairing power tools and table saws, then started building telescopes. One had a 24-inch mirror and was 12 feet tall.

"I took that telescope to national parks and monuments for years. I went to Yosemite, Grand Canyon, Death Valley, all over the place. I went to universities and schools, showing the stars to the public."

He joined a religious cult and started his walks across the country. "I only ate what people gave me, what I asked for. I asked for beans, bread, peanut butter. I also asked for bed sheets that I cut up and sewed to make clothing. I went barefoot on my treks across the country. It hurt sometimes when I walked on the shoulders along the highway. The gravel is very big and grinds into your feet. That sojourn was something I just had to do. I just had to go find my way."

When he decided to give up that life, he got some regular clothing. "I stopped in San Antonio at a garage sale and a woman was selling her husband's clothes. He had just died. I got some tennis shoes, a pair of pants and a shirt. She gave them to me."

From San Antonio he headed west with a new frame of mind. "I wanted to be normal. I didn't want to go on any more. I had no desire to move another inch. I got to that intersection of the Interstate and Highway 377 and settled down."

Brian has a pet goose named Goose. He says they have bonded for life. Golf balls on the Sonora course are yellow with black stripes. Birds pecked at the white ones. Once Goose thought the white balls were eggs and she put them in her nest.
