FIREPLACE SAFETY

The charming fireplace in your new home is one of the details you love most. No doubt your eager to enjoy it's warm glow with family and friends. But before you light up the first log, it's important to make sure that the box your fireplace and chimney are in safe working order. Examine the firebox, look for any cracks, gaps or signs of wear in the lining of the firebox. If the lining has deteriorated to the point that the steel body beneath it is visible inside your fireplace, that could cause permanent damage.

Smoke stains can be another signal that your fireplace isn't functioning properly. If you see stains on the ceiling, smoke could be escaping from a gap between the hearth and firebox. These are most likely because the hearth has settled, not an unusual occurrence in an older home.

When this settling occurs, sparks that fall into the gap can send up smoke essentially acting as a secondary chimney. If you notice stains above the fireplace opening, in this case the problem may be the flu damper a mechanism with a hand operated lever that helps you control the air flow into the fireplace. If the lever is damaged or caked with gunk, you may not be able to open or close the damper completely, which can cause smoke to leak out of the fireplace. A professional can determine if the mechanism can be fixed or it needs replacing.
