Ask the Acupuncturist Veronica Cavella Pedersen, L.Ac.

Q.: My mother was recently diagnosed with macular degeneration and is slipping into depression because she was told by her eye doctor that this condition can lead to blindness. He said there is no cure and offered no treatment, just a "wait and see" approach. I hate see-ing her like this and am hoping that Chinese Medicine may at least offer her some hope.

A.: Chinese Medical

A.: Chinese Medical Ophthalmology is a specialty within Chinese Medicine which treats all types of eye conditions, including degenerative eye diseases, even when Western Medicine says there is nothing that can be done. This kind of diagnosis is very alarming and diagnosis is very alarming and often depressing. All of our senses are very precious, but loss of sight is the one dreaded most.

Conventional medicine tends to look at the eye and all of its parts and workings as somehow sepa-rate and independent, and eye disease as an isolated organ nathology.

In contrast, Chinese Medicine takes a more holistic approach, acknowledging that the eye is part of an integrated system, the human body, mind and spirit, in which each part is affected by the health of the whole, and vice versa. Treatment will be directed to both the presenting eye condition and the underlying cause. Acupuncture will be an important part of treatment, but let me assure you that no needles are inserted into the eye itself! Some points near the eye are used, as well as body points in various locations, depending on the patient's condition. Instruction will be given for eye exercises and acupressure to be done at home, along with sug-gestions for supplements and Chinese Herbal Formulas known to benefit the eye. Diet and lifestyle will be discussed with the patient to see what improve-ments may be needed. Patients often report that they start to see better when they are exercising so this is part of the plan. Stress reduction is also very important to eve health and will be addressed along with any other psychological factors which may be impacting vision. The patient is very much involved in his/her own recovery which appeals to many instead of the "wait and see" approach.

In addition to macular degenera-tion, some of the other chronic eye conditions treated by Chinese Medicine include retinitis pigmentosa, glaucoma, cataracts, dry eye, photophobia, and poor night vision. A highly trained Acupuncturist can offer not only hope, but well documented results to people with eye problems. Just as every patient is different, results can vary but can include prevention of eye problems, preservation of current vision, and even recovery of some vision that was lost. Hopefully this information will
