Researchers are discovering that post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) is a significant risk factor in developing dementia. A new study, published in the Journal of the American Geriatrics Society, discovered that taking certain antidepressants, tranquilizers, sedatives, or antipsychotic medication significantly increased veterans' risks for developing dementia compared to the risks for veterans who didn't take such medications. Dementia is a memory problem that affects a person's ability to carry out usual tasks. Dementia is a leading cause of serious illness, disability, and death. It often requires care in a nursing home or other long-term care facility for people aged 65 and older. Medicines that significantly increased dementia risk included selective serotonin reuptake inhibitors (SSRIs). What's more, veterans who used serotonin-norepinephrine reuptake inhibitors (SNRIs) or benzodiazepines were also more likely to be diagnosed with dementia whether or not they had PTSD.

Millions of times a year, Americans get prescriptions for a week's worth of steroid pills such as prednisone, hoping to ease a backache or quell a nagging cough or allergy symptoms. But a new study suggests that they and their doctors might want to pay a bit more attention to the potential side effects of this medication. People taking the pills were more likely to break a bone, develop a potentially dangerous blood clot or suffer a life-threatening bout of sepsis in the months after their treatment, compared with similar adults who didn't use corticosteroids, researchers report in a new paper in BMJ (formerly The British Medical Journal). Though only a small percentage of both groups went to the hospital for these serious health threats, the higher rates seen among people who took steroids for even a few days are cause for caution and even concern, the researchers say.
